Tell your friends they have until you finish improvising a haiku to figure out why Lizzie's roommates are angry at her. Then: Improvise a haiku. It's your choice whether to recite it to your friends.

Put this card in your mouth and leave it there for five seconds. Remove it and inspect. If there's saliva on it, you lose. If there's teeth marks on it, you win.

In a group of four or more people, put this card text up on a table, without showing anyone else the image, and tell them each to guess how many objects depicted on the other side are pink. Single out one friend and tell them you think they'll get the answer right. Once everyone's guessed, flip the card around and count them. If the person you singled out guessed right, you keep this card. Otherwise, you give it to the correct guesser (if there was one) for their keeping for them to play whenever. If no one guessed right, nothing happens.

Carry this card with you at all times. Every time you meet a new person, show the picture on the other side of this card to them and ask them what they think. No matter what they say, respond by shaking your head, saying "How disappointing," and never clarifying or bringing up the subject again.

Put this card in the bathroom next to your toilet. Every time you take a shit, look at this card and think of one good reason not to use it as toilet paper. You may not use the same excuse twice. When you find yourself unable to think of any more reasons, do as you will.

Use tape to stick this card under a restaurant table. If you find this card, you can't take it unless you tip your server 100%. If you can't afford to do that, you can't have this card.

Place this card in a safe or locker somewhere and lock it up tight. Think about this card always. If you ever find yourself thinking about something else, go back to thinking about this card. Never let your thoughts drift. You may never open the safe or locker where this card is kept for as long as you live.

Superglue this card to your bedroom floor, text side down, and make a point to step on it every time you walk in.
